"About Us" Page for ObitFund.com

When a loved one passes away, the traditional way of honoring them is to put an obituary in the newspaper, but these obituaries likely won't even be seen by the person's friends and family, since less than 25% of Americans read the newspaper today. Obituaries are also expensive to publish, which can make it hard, or even impossible, for families to give their loved one the tribute they deserve.

Printed newspapers last only one day. Even obituaries published in online newspapers are deleted, on average, after 30 days. Text and pictures are limited in size and format.
An obituary on Obit Fund will always stay online, with the all the photos, detail, and customization that your loved one's life deserves.

Flowers and cards last a short time, and are often impersonal and generic.
When you create an obituary for your loved one, choose a charity for a cause they cared about. Donations to that charity from family and friends ensure that their memory, values, and name will live on for years to come.
